Currently, children with cancer must endure tumour biopsy— a painful and invasive procedure that provides limited information about the different types of cancer cells in the tumour at a point in time.

Although cancer cells in a tumour constantly change, repeated biopsies to monitor tumour progression are not a feasible or ethical option. The ACRF Child Cancer Liquid Biopsy program will address this challenge by developing a more sensitive and much less invasive type of sampling, based on a child's blood or lymph fluid.

The program will harness the latest technologies to develop a suite of blood tests for childhood cancer patients aimed at improved diagnosis, earlier relapse detection, better monitoring of treatment response and enhanced delivery of the right treatment to the right child at the right time.

Ellie diagnosed with cancer when she was only 11 months old.
